

Elber Twomey's Story

Irish woman Elber Twomey tells of her sorrow while on holiday in England when a suicidal taxi-driver drove into her car killing her unborn child, her 2-year old and her husband.

Every day Elber asks her 'heavenly army' to give her strength to get out of bed in the morning. She has found strength by moving away from her initial anger and resentment to having compassion for the Polish suicidal taxi-driver who left behind a devastated widow. She now lights candles for him and campaigns for other suicidal drivers.

Elber runs a campaign to change the way the police handles suicidal drivers. She believed that the suicidal driver who purposely drove into the car was provoked by the police trying to flag him down. New training has now been implemented in English police forces on how to handle such volatile situations. Elber is also in negotiation with the Garda Training College in Ireland to create similar changes as her greatest wish is that what happened to her would never happen to anyone else.
